

“If these people should hold their peace, the very stones would cry out to celebrate my coming.
—Jesus

You are already familiar, through experience, with the energetic properties of crystals and minerals. For all solid matter is made up of atomic particles arranged in some definite organized crystalline structure, called a “lattice.” The crystal lattice structure, especially as it is found in minerals such as quartz, beryl, diamond, etc., provides great stability of structure and regularity of flow of any electromagnetic energy that moves through it. This is why silicon chips are used to provide memory in computers. It is also the reason quartz crystals can be incorporated into watches and clocks to provide highly accurate measurements of time.

A property of quartz and some other minerals which make them useful in many areas of everyday life is the piezoelectric effect. The word “piezo” is Greek for “push” or “press.” The effect known as piezoelectricity was discovered by brothers Pierre and Jacques Curie in 1880. Crystals which acquire a charge when compressed are said to be piezoelectric. Through this effect, mechanical energy can be transduced into electromagnetic energy, and vice versa. The first practical use of piezoelectric crystals goes back to the early 1920s, when the stability of early broadcasting stations was much improved with a crystal oscillator. The quartz crystal is still used in radios due to its stability as channels are split and narrowed to allow greater use of the radio spectrum.

Other types of crystals, notably galena and pyrite, are used in constructing crystal radio receivers. These crystals are able to transduce the electromagnetic energy of the radio signal back into sound waves that are audible to the listener.

These examples demonstrate that certain crystals can act as resonators and transducers of electromagnetic energies. With this principle in mind, it is not too great a leap to imagine that they may be capable of transforming and/or amplifying other forms of energy which the human body and its consciousness is capable of detecting.

One of the surprises encountered in the search for an explanation of stone energies is the crystallinity of living organisms. The DNA molecule present in each cell of all living organisms is itself a hexagonal crystal structure, approximately ten atoms wide by six feet long. Of course, the DNA molecule is intricately folded in order to fit into the tiny cell nucleus, but if the DNA molecules in a single human body were stretched out to full length and strung together, the distance covered would be 125 billion miles, or about 70 round trips between Saturn and the sun. Yet the crystal lattice structure of these infinitesimally thin threads is so strong that the codes of life which give each organism its form and character have been carried by it through billions of years of evolution.

Biophysicists are now suggesting that the physical body of human beings and other organisms are liquid crystals. A liquid crystal is defined as a liquid whose component particles, atoms or molecules, tend to arrange themselves with a degree of order far exceeding that found in ordinary liquids and approaching that of solid crystals.

Because of this, it is not difficult to understand that we are not so different, so separate from the inorganic world of minerals as one may have thought. Thus we ourselves are crystals, composed of coherent structures approaching that of solid crystals, yet retaining the greater flexibility of liquid crystallinity.

Throughout history, the idea of conscious linkage through the use of crystals with the source of life—the Divine—is by no means new, and we know that much thought, as exemplified in the phrase, “as above, so below,” evokes an awe toward Nature, a sense that we share consciousness with plants, animals, stars and stones, and that ALL living creatures, including stones, share a consciousness with the spiritual genius of the earth. ■

“The observer, when he seems to be observing a stone, is really, if physics is to be believed, observing the effects of the stone upon himself.”

—Bertrand Russell
