

Understanding & Directing Nature's Abundance

My father was a dowser. He was reared as a farm boy in upstate New York. He was a good farmer because he, like his father, knew the land and the sources of water and energy beneath the land. They used dowsing rods, even coat hangers, to find the sources to drill for wells.

Dowsing is traditionally a technique used to search for underground water, minerals, or anything invisible, by observing the motion of a pointer (once a forked stick and now a pair of bent rods), which move in response to unseen influences. Dowsing has now evolved into a divining practice that can also detect and cure energy blockages or deficits in the environment.

As my dad became a man, he moved to Cleveland where he worked for a bus-line company, married my mother, and moved his growing family to an rural area 30 miles south of that city, where he owned a house and had a garden. He then sold that house and moved even farther out, where he used his rods to build a new house with a new well. As time went by, he used the rods to plant the orchards and the blueberries bushes. We always had abundance in the garden. We gave bushels of vegetables and fruit away to the neighbors. When it was time for the orchards to be cut down, he saw that the land was returned to its natural state. In the same way he, too, passed away naturally, but with very little money in the bank. He had limited the harmonious energy flow guided by dowsing to just the garden and not to the rest of his life. He was the poor dad as portrayed in Robert Kyosaki's book Rich Dad, Poor Dad.

Today, the function of dowsing for energy fields that impact our health and environment has been expanded, and with the advance of technology, the science of dowsing has become more complicated. I use dowsing rods for more than finding vortexes (the cross points of two center lines of stress) and correcting ley lines with copper sticks. My father didn't have to deal with electromagnetic fields from power lines, electrical appliances, or cell towers because there weren't any. He was mainly concerned with fault lines, underground water, and different adjoining soils (called geopathic stress).

Geopathic stress occurs when the natural energy vibration from the earth is interrupted. Finding and curing geopathic stress around a house or building has tremendous impact on the health of the people inside. For example, in one local house, the residents complained of not wanting to sleep in the bed in a corner of the basement. The first night I slept there as a guest, I had nightmares. The next day, I found the geopathic stress line and used copper rods to cure the situation, as shown in the photos. From then on, I slept in that bed like a baby.

Today, dowsing has been used by miners, engineers, ranchers, farmers, and even the armed forces to find everything from silver to iron ore, from water to buried cables. Some "energy dowsers" use it to find historically sacred and spiritual sites. I use it to heal sick houses and apartment buildings—and people.

One house I worked on was sick because of geopathic stress and the energy of the surrounding neighborhood. While my son oversaw the work on the inside with workmen, while I found and cured geopathic stress on the outside. I asked the dowsing rods: "Are there any geopathic stress lines here?" and I moved around the house with the rods in my hands. The rods came open when I found two stress lines that intersected near the front porch. I used copper rods with blue tips to correct the flow and put an angel statue on top of the sticks to make sure they couldn't be moved (see picture). But when we had troubles with the contractor who made promises and didn't do the work, I suspected that the house needed more help to get healthy. That demanded even more techniques with specific stones and crystals that have

Dowsing Consultations & Corrections

Quantum Energy Technology
Brain Enhancements
Vitality • ADHD • Autism

Mary Clement, Ph.D.
Wellness Consultant

615-559-5272 • maryclement@reagan.com

Mary determining the location for corrective copper rods (one shown above) as she dowses for geopathic stress. Another house, below, recently dowsed and corrected.

been programmed for specific qualities. In fact, we had to include the houses next to ours and the vacant lots and the abandoned house across the street. (The karma runs deep in this neighborhood!)

The nearby apartment building also needed help. My son and some investors had purchased the 12-unit apartment building and now they were worried because their MBA techniques of marketing were not getting quality tenants. After nearly a year of trying everything they could think of, with the units only half full, and some of the residents not paying their rent, they hired me to do my work. I first squared up the property and developed a protected field. Each unit, after being cleaned and newly painted, was charged with new energy to dispel the past negative energy of people who left behind their anger as if it was embedded in the walls. (If you listen to your own body when you enter a room, you can feel the energy of the room as if the walls are talking.) I had to use other, more advance technology to change the vibration in each unit and the property as a whole, as it was part of this neighborhood that had issues.

Sick houses and apartments increase our negative thinking, rob us of joy of living, and increase our doubts and fears. Contrast that with healthy environments that uplift us and motivate us to achieve greater good for all. In healthy homes, we get the sleep and peace that we need to restore our own bodies and minds. When the natural vibrations of the earth become negative, they impact our bodies and immune systems. Physically, emotionally, and spiritually we are diminished. Addressing those negative vibrations mean that we can live more physically, emotionally and spiritually whole.

In a work environment, we find higher productivity and less employee sick days when buildings are corrected for energy disturbances. Some builders today are now building with these principals in mind, leaving the old buildings with lots of stress (“sick buildings”) to be corrected.

The dowsing rods can be used long distance over the phone, or in person. They can be used to determine what is off in a body, a house or other buildings, and on land. They can assist in increasing the flow of positive energy.

My dowsing consultations are $50 for one hour, with corrections such as copper rods, programmed crystals and stones, for a small additional charge. If you feel stuck and want more abundance of every good thing in your life, call me. I will continue our family tradition of dowsing to help you correct the imbalances that surround you, so you can have the natural increase that is your birthright. Unlike my beloved poor-dad father, you can be the rich dad in your book of life! ■