The Privilege of Fatherhood

As I pen this on Father's Day, I trust the readers will indulge me for a little fatherly bragging. There is no father who is not proud of his daughters, in this case, my twins, Vicky and Shelly. Here is Shelly's talent at skateboard art, which fetched a good price at the recent auction for Livingston's new skate park.

Vicky & Shelly Ouellette

And here is a poem written by Vicky, at 19 already a writer. Both will be leaving soon to attend Prescott College, a progressive liberal-arts school in Arizona. —Denis O.

Lightness

In my next life, I want to be the wind on a hot, sticky day—the sweet cool that caresses your warmth. I want to be the stretch of a shadow—the silhouette of a palm leaf as it grows across the red dirt, reaching, reaching...

I want to be the spray of a waterfall, saying yes! I am something thunderous and powerful but I will still touch you gently.

I want to be a sprig of green shooting up through a sidewalk crack, witness to private acts of kindness, privy to secret thoughts of self-destruction. People will look at me and say, "It's a miracle" and I will laugh because they don't realize it is they who are the miracle.

I want to be something untouchable. The first break of dawn as it splits through the dark and lands on an unsuspecting scowl. Seeping my warmth into the broken places, filling even the deepest fractures with a liquid softness that grows and swells and washes over you in a way that you can't shake the lightness in your soul for a full day.

Feel free to wish them well at v.jo12@yahoo.com (Vicky) and (Shelly) at michelle.alia.ouellette@gmail.com.
